When kids have some down time, they grow and create memories

For many socio-economic reasons, low-income children often start school far behind their middle- and upper-income peers. They know fewer words, are exposed to fewer books and are less prepared for the demands of a structured school day. That's why it's so important to keep your kids reading over the summer. Visit your local library for new, exciting books. Go to free, cultural events to bring learning to life. And talk about your day, what's going on in the world around you and your family. Click here for more summer learning tips.
